My grandson and I seem to have selected this book a little ahead of his best time for it, as he is still only 9 months old. His parents have had a look at it and given me their provisional thoughts about it, although when the little fellow himself got his hands on it his main interest was in trying to chew it. The time is going to pass quickly, and I shall be very interested to hear when he starts taking some kind of interest, and in what - the pictures, or the sounds? It should make an interesting series of milestones marking one side of his development. To confirm what other reviewers have already reported, there are 5 (I think) double-page fold-out sheets, and the dinosaur noises accompany each half-sheet. The sound quality seems OK to us - I mean, a toddler is not going to be all that discriminating. As far as hereditary traits are concerned, I well recall that his father was intensely interested in which animals were the fiercest, from practically as soon as he could talk. On that basis, we should not be kept waiting until age 4 or 5 to get a significant reaction, maybe not even until we reach age 3, which is what the parents are currently guessing. However it turns out, this looks a good investment for the near future.
